QUESTION ONE

Umoja Innovations Ltd is a fast-growing technology and logistics company operating across several counties in Kenya. The organization specializes in digital transport systems, e-commerce support services, and green supply chain solutions. Over the last decade, the company experienced rapid expansion due to increased demand for digital business services and environmentally sustainable operations.

Despite its rapid growth, the organization recently began experiencing several leadership and organizational challenges. Employees complained about poor communication between management and staff, delayed decision-making, low employee morale, and increased workplace conflicts. Younger employees felt excluded from leadership processes while senior managers resisted organizational reforms proposed by new executives.

The company's founder and Chief Executive Officer, Mr. Daniel Mwangi, recognized that the organization was becoming increasingly difficult to manage due to technological changes, market competition, workforce diversity, and changing customer expectations. He therefore initiated a major leadership transformation programme aimed at strengthening organizational culture, enhancing employee motivation, and improving organizational adaptability within the modern business environment.

As part of the transformation programme, management introduced leadership mentorship systems, employee empowerment initiatives, collaborative decision-making structures, and digital communication platforms. The organization also launched several sustainability projects including paperless operations, energy conservation initiatives, recycling programmes, and environmentally friendly transport systems.

Although some departments embraced the transformation process positively, others remained resistant to change. Some employees feared losing authority and influence within the organization, while others lacked confidence in adapting to new technologies and leadership expectations. Tensions further emerged between managers who preferred traditional leadership approaches and younger leaders advocating for innovation and participatory leadership practices.

The Board of Directors later commissioned an internal review which revealed that the organization required stronger transformational leadership practices, adaptive leadership capabilities, and modern sustainability strategies in order to remain competitive in the 21st-century business environment.
